Difference Between M.Phil. And Ph.D.

Meaning

M.Phil. Defines as a second master's degree course, and it offers significant chances to the students to pursue knowledge from advanced research work.

In contrast, Doctor of Philosophy (Ph.D.) is a professional degree course that eminently offers the doctorate students to become a faculty position and teach the students at university level on the corresponding relative subject that they researched.

Duration

The duration of the M.Phil. The program is for two years. One year is for the course work, and another one is for the submission of the dissertation.

On the contrary, the minimum period of the Ph.D. course is three years.

The time can be extended up to five years, varies on the submission of the proposal and the approval of the thesis.

Stipend

The M.Phil. Students may not receive any stipend, while the Ph.D. learners are awarded for the allowance to conduct the research work from the university.

The program of M.Phil. includes the necessary research work, and the students mainly focus on the other scholars' researches on their respective fields. But in the Ph.D. program, the candidates are required to submit original and individual advanced research work on their particular area.

Program Structure

The M.Phil. program structure consists of two significant goals. The first one is one-years course work, and the second most eminent one is dissertation submission work conducted under the supervision of professionals.

The experts examine the thesis work or the dissertation. The learners necessarily attend a seminar, where they submit the proposal of their research work before the final submission of the dissertation.

Conversely, the Ph.D. program comes with the one-year coursework followed by the thesis work under the observation of a skilled supervisor.

Finally, the personal newly worked thesis paper has to submit within two years due date for pursuing a Ph.D. degree.
